

Embassy Ethics.

We decided at the very start of Embassy that we didn't want to put profit before planet.

Whether skiing in the alps, or surfing the waves in Cornwall, the environment plays a big role in our lives. We want to play our part in helping to protect and preserve it for future generations.

With this in mind, Embassy pledges to invest in environmental projects and actively work to offset its Carbon Emissions. We use a company called Mossy Earth to do this – with a regular subscription and an offset at the end of each project. There are many Carbon Offset companies out there, with carbon credits and other 'rewards'. With Mossy Earth, we found that we share their transparent approach to what they do – which reflects our own views and aspirations.

Closer to home, we regularly give our time to local charities and organisations - not only in our film production roles but in any way that we can help. At Embassy we foster diversity, both in how we work and who we work with. We will also strive to encourage young people from all backgrounds to get involved in the creative industries. When possible, we will bring assistants and work experience people with us on projects.

Being smaller than some of our competitors is an advantage – allowing us to start with a robust environmental approach to what we do. Although far from perfect, we strive to do better and welcome opportunities to share knowledge.

We hope you share in our ethos and we look forward to working with you.
